Shoe Heels of Pulp.
One of the latest features of wood pulp industry is the manufacture, in Haverhill, Mass., of shoe heels from that material, white pine and other kinds being used for the purpose. In carrying out this art the plan, as described, consists in reducing the wood in the usual way in digesters, after which the pulp is put into a tank and mixed with the substances necessary for imparting to heel stock the necessary requirements, such as alcohol, litharge, tar, dextrin and fish glue, a thorough mixing of these with the pulp being followed by soaking the same a day or two, so that the fiber may be penetrated, when another application of materials occurs. The object at this stage is to harden the pulp somewhat, so that it can be rolled into thick sheets and handled, shellac and borax accomplishing this, the pulp thus having the consistency of cement. At this point slackened lime is put in, and, as this hardens when dry, the pulp must be rolled into sheets and cut into heels before the hardening takes place. With needed rapidity the pulp is now drawn from the tank in sheets, it being just thick enough, and there being specially arranged rollers and adjustments at the bottom of the tank for effecting this. A series of pressures through press rollers reduces the sheet to the right thickness, and the sheet is next placed quickly upon the bed of a cutter; the wheels are now started, and in a moment the platen falls, forcing a hundred or more cutters upon the sheet, shaping out a heel each.—New York Herald.

Not That Time.
"What I want to know," said the early oyster, "is whether I am to be in the swim this season."
"Not this time," said the cook, as he scooped him into a pottle.—Detroit Free Press.
